

HISTORICAL GEOGRAPHY: EDITORIAL UPDATE

We are delighted to announce the full contents of our 2016 issue, volume 44. As many readers know, we now publish a mid-year “in press” edition, which this year featured the text of William Wyckoff’s wonderfully illustrated and insightful Distinguished Historical Geographer lecture, originally presented at the American Association of Geographers’ meeting in April. Our full issue, released in December, features Wyckoff’s text at the head, along with an exciting special issue, regular research articles, and book reviews.

Our special issue section highlights recent scholarship in Feminist Historical Geographies. Co-edited by Tamar Rothenberg, Karen M. Morin, and Mona Domosh, this collection of papers emerged from lively sessions at the International Conference of Historical Geographers in London in 2015. In addition to thanking them for shepherding these papers to publication, we echo the co-editors’ hope that these papers inspire continuing scholarly exploration of critical and feminist historical geographies.

Regular research articles in Volume 44 reflect the growing diversity of historical geographical scholarship, in subject matter, regional focus, and historical period. Christopher Hewitt deploys historical GIS insights to reconsider the site of the Battle of Hastings, while Kyle Evered and Emine Önhan Evered explore discourses of public health and social order in the early Turkish republic. And as usual, we feature a rich selection of book reviews, curated and edited by book review editor, John Bauer. As many readers will know, book reviews are now also published twice yearly, and are open access from the date of publication (as is the Distinguished Historical Geographer lecture).

Our online home is still at ejournals.unm.edu/index.php/historicalgeography, where authors are welcome and encouraged to upload article submissions through the online portal. As always, we encourage submissions that use diverse digital media forms for both analysis and presentation. Don’t forget that you can manage your subscriptions through this same online site, although paid members of the AAG’s Historical Geography Specialty Group are renewed and updated automatically. Anyone who is interested in editing a future special issue on a particular theme should contact Maria Lane (mdlane@unm.edu) and Arn Keeling (akeeling@mun.ca) to discuss topical and scheduling considerations.

Finally, we would like to thank Jeremy Work and Courtney Brock, MS students at the University of New Mexico, for their tireless work this year on journal production. We are grateful for your professionalism and your support. The publication of Historical Geography is supported by Historical Geography Specialty Group of the American Association of Geographers and the University of New Mexico.
